As Australians prepare for this weekend's $30 million Saturday Megadraw, new figures have revealed which suburbs have emerged as the luckiest when it comes to striking it rich. Data released by The Lott shows that during the 2024–2025 financial year, more than 533 individuals across the country claimed division one prizes, sharing in a staggering $1.69 billion in winnings. The timing of the announcement has sent a ripple of excitement through hopeful ticket holders looking for a winning edge ahead of one of the year's biggest draws.

Victoria and New South Wales led the nation in both the number of division one winners and the total prize money awarded. Victoria topped the leaderboard with 152 winners, while New South Wales players took home the most prize money, banking a combined $532.3 million.

Suburbs like Melton in Victoria and Liverpool in New South Wales have repeatedly proven lucky for locals, with each producing multiple winning tickets in recent years. Such statistics have sparked a surge in ticket sales across these areas, as Australians chase what could be life-changing fortune.

The Lott, the national lottery operator, emphasised that while some suburbs have a track record of producing more winners, every ticket has an equal chance of success. "It's purely chance, but patterns tend to fuel hope," a spokesperson from The Lott said. In an economy where many are feeling the pinch from rising costs of living, the appeal of a multimillion-dollar windfall offers both a dream and a brief escape from financial pressures. Notably, Queensland and Western Australia also reported strong numbers, indicating that winning luck is well spread across the country.

With anticipation building toward Saturday night's draw, Australians from all walks of life are expected to try their luck, many latching onto stories of previous winners who turned modest tickets into multi-million dollar fortunes. The $30 million Megadraw represents more than just a game of chance; it offers the possibility of financial freedom, a fresh start, and for some, a renewed sense of hope. As the countdown begins, one thing is certain: someone, somewhere, could wake up on Sunday morning with their entire future changed by a single lucky ticket.
