Aldi Australia shoppers have voiced frustration after discovering that Colway Spicy Barbecue Sauce has been permanently removed from store shelves. The supermarket chain confirmed the decision, explaining that it was part of routine product changes across its stores.

The disappearance of the sauce was first noticed by customers on social media, with discussions quickly gaining traction on platforms such as Reddit. Many shoppers expressed confusion and disappointment over the sudden unavailability of the pantry staple.

“Does anyone know what happened to the spicy BBQ sauce they had in Aldi?” one user asked. “It looks like they don’t sell it anymore or something, and I’ve been looking for a while. It is so good!”

Other customers shared similar experiences. “I have also looked everywhere! Aldi, please bring it back!” another shopper wrote, reflecting widespread sentiment.

In response to inquiries, an Aldi spokesperson told Daily Mail Australia: “Aldi has deleted the Colway Spicy BBQ Sauce from its core range.” The company emphasized that discontinuing certain products is a standard practice, allowing the retailer to refresh its offerings regularly.

The removal has drawn attention from shoppers who considered the sauce a must-have item in their kitchens. Aldi’s model of regularly updating product lines helps maintain cost-effective pricing and introduce new items, though it can leave loyal customers disappointed when favorites are no longer available.

This is not the first instance of Aldi customers expressing dissatisfaction over discontinued products. Online forums and social media pages dedicated to the supermarket frequently highlight items that vanish from shelves, often prompting calls for their return.

For now, shoppers seeking the Colway Spicy Barbecue Sauce will need to explore alternatives within Aldi’s current range or from other retailers. The incident demonstrates the strong loyalty Aldi has built in Australia, with customers eager to share both praise and criticism of the supermarket’s offerings.
