Three people, including the suspected shooter, were killed and several others injured, including a police officer, after gunfire broke out Sunday at a church in Lexington, Kentucky.

The incident occurred at Richmond Road Baptist Church, where emergency responders were dispatched following reports of an active shooter. Kentucky Governor Andy Beshear confirmed the attack in a post on X, formerly known as Twitter. According to his statement, two individuals were killed before the shooter was also killed. Several others were wounded and transported to the hospital for treatment.

No further details about the identities of the victims or the shooter were provided. The number of injured individuals and their conditions have not yet been publicly disclosed. The governor's message made clear the seriousness of the situation, especially with a police officer among the injured.

Church Shooting

While the full details of what led to the shooting are still under investigation, what is known so far has sent shockwaves through the Lexington community.

With a police officer among those hurt, the situation highlights the danger first responders face when rushing into unknown and potentially deadly scenarios. However, officials have not yet released any additional information on how the confrontation unfolded or whether the officer had returned fire.

At this point, neither local law enforcement nor federal authorities have issued statements with more specific details about the sequence of events or the weapon used. It is also unclear whether the church was holding a service at the time of the attack or how many people were present.

Governor Beshear's statement did not offer a motive or suggest any possible connections the shooter may have had to the church or its congregation.

This tragedy is yet another painful reminder of the increasing number of violent incidents happening in public and community spaces. While Kentucky law enforcement continues to investigate, many in Lexington are left looking for answers and struggling to process what happened in their city.

Authorities are expected to provide more information as the investigation develops.
