Robbie Williams Buys £30 Million Miami Mansion with Private Dock and 18-Car Garage

British pop star Robbie Williams has reportedly bought a luxurious waterfront mansion in Miami for a staggering £30 million. The purchase marks yet another major move in the singer's shifting global real estate portfolio, following a series of high-value property sales over the past two years.

According to the New York Post, Williams, 51, and his wife, Ayda Field, are set to relocate to the Florida property, which offers a mix of luxury and privacy. The mansion features seven bedrooms, a massive garage capable of holding 18 cars, a private dock with direct water access, and a fully stocked wine cellar. Reports say the couple also spent an additional £4 million on renovations, furnishings, and personal upgrades to turn the house into their ideal family home.

The singer appears to be going all-in on his new Florida base. Manny Angelo Varas, the Miami-based developer overseeing the home's transformation, told The Post, "We're doing a ground-up build. He'll be relocating immediately to the existing home, and we're going to be doing new construction, adding between 2,500 and 3,500 square feet." Varas added that part of the expansion will include flexible spaces that could serve as a home recording studio, allowing Williams to work from home when not touring.

There are also talks of installing a floating padel court, which, if completed, would be the first of its kind in a private U.S. residence. Real Housewives of Miami star Dr. Nicole Martin and her husband, Anthony Lopez, previously owned the property.

This Miami acquisition follows a string of recent property sales by the former Take That frontman. In May last year, Williams sold his mansion in Los Angeles' exclusive Holmby Hills neighborhood for £51.6 million (approximately $65 million). He had purchased that estate for £39.3 million in March 2022, meaning he walked away with a profit of about £12.3 million in just over two years.

The Holmby Hills property, known as the "Funny Girl" Estate, spans nearly two acres and includes three houses, eight bedrooms, 11 bathrooms, a swimming pool, a tennis court, and a 15-car garage. Originally built in 1938 for actress and comedian Fanny Brice — the inspiration for the Broadway musical Funny Girl, famously portrayed by Barbra Streisand — the estate has a rich Hollywood history.

Williams also sold another Los Angeles mansion in 2022 to rapper Drake in a private deal estimated between $35 million and $50 million. That home boasted ten bedrooms and 22 bathrooms. Around the same time, he sold his estate in Wiltshire, England, for £6.75 million.

The buyer of the Holmby Hills estate is reportedly Lapro Property Trust, a Sydney-based entity linked to Australian billionaire Nick Molnar, co-founder of Afterpay. Molnar has a history of high-profile property deals, including purchasing the late actor Matthew Perry's Century City penthouse, which he later sold to pop star Rihanna.

With several major sales under his belt, Williams is now left with just one known property: a £17.5 million residence in the upscale Kensington area of London.

Williams has been open about the challenges of frequent relocations and raising four young children while maintaining a busy career. In 2022, speaking to Australian radio hosts Kyle Sandilands and Jackie “O” Henderson, he said, “We’re actually nowhere. We haven’t got an abode right now, we’ve pretty much sold everywhere, we don’t live anywhere, and we’re trying to figure it out.”

The couple’s children play a significant role in settling down decisions. Williams previously explained, “The four kids are constantly a Rubik’s Cube puzzle that we’re trying to sort out because if they are schooled, then they don’t see me because I’m all over the place, and if they are home-schooled, then they have another set of things that are a problem.”

As the family prepares to settle into their Miami mansion, Williams is finally putting down roots, at least for now. With more space, a possible recording studio, and room for his growing family, the new home appears to be a carefully chosen investment in comfort, convenience, and long-term lifestyle.
