A man in Chak Jhumra has been arrested by police for allegedly accepting a bribe of Rs200,000 to avoid identifying robbery suspects during an official police lineup.

The incident is tied to FIR No. 1066/25, lodged at the Chak Jhumra Police Station in Faisalabad district. The case initially involved a reported robbery, for which multiple suspects were arrested and sent to jail pending an official identification parade.

According to the police report, the complainant in the robbery case, Azmat Ali, failed to appear during the scheduled identification proceedings. This absence raised concerns among investigators, prompting a deeper inquiry into his actions.

Subsequent investigation revealed that Azmat Ali had allegedly been in contact with the robbery suspects and entered into a monetary agreement with them. Police officials state that he accepted a bribe amounting to Rs200,000 in return for intentionally not participating in the identification process. This deliberate absence compromised a crucial step in the investigation aimed at confirming the involvement of the arrested individuals.

Law enforcement personnel acted on this information and detained Azmat Ali, who is now under investigation for interfering in a criminal case and obstructing justice. Authorities are treating the matter seriously due to the potential impact such actions can have on the integrity of police procedures and legal outcomes.

A police spokesperson stated that further inquiries are underway to determine whether others may have been involved or aware of the alleged bribe arrangement. Officials have also confirmed that Azmat Ali will be produced before a magistrate for remand.

Bribery, particularly in cases involving criminal identification, is considered a severe offense in Pakistan as it directly affects the pursuit of justice. Law enforcement agencies are emphasizing transparency and accountability as part of their broader effort to curb corruption within the justice system.

The case continues to develop, and police have assured the public that appropriate legal action will be taken in accordance with the law.
