

OpenVoiceNews Australia

Transparent. Unbiased. Yours.

NSW MP Mark Latham Denies Former Partner's Allegations

July 14, 2025

— Categories: General News

New South Wales Member of Parliament Mark Latham has denied allegations of abuse made by a former partner, describing the claims as false, damaging, and deeply distressing to himself and his family.

Latham, who leads the NSW branch of Pauline Hanson's One Nation party, addressed the matter in a public statement this week after the allegations surfaced and attracted national media attention. He stated, "The claims made are untrue and damaging to both myself and my family," firmly denying any history of violence or abusive behavior in his personal relationships.

The allegations come from a woman who was previously in a relationship with Latham. While specific details have not been publicly disclosed, reports suggest they involve claims of controlling behavior and emotional harm. Latham has rejected these assertions outright and indicated he may pursue legal action to defend his reputation.

As of now, no formal charges have been filed, and law enforcement has not announced an investigation. Despite this, the allegations have drawn significant public interest, particularly given Latham's prominent political role and leadership position.

Supporters of Latham have defended him, suggesting the accusations may be politically motivated or unsubstantiated. Others have emphasized the importance of due process, calling for a fair and impartial review if a formal complaint is lodged.

The situation highlights the broader challenge public figures face when private disputes enter the public domain. Allegations of abuse regardless of legal outcome can have lasting consequences on both reputations and careers. For Latham, a polarizing figure known for his outspoken style, the claims mark a serious and personal development in his political journey.

This is not the first time Latham has faced controversy. However, these allegations carry a more personal weight, and reactions remain divided. He continues to serve as an MP and has requested privacy for his family, expressing confidence that the truth will prevail.

It remains to be seen whether formal legal proceedings will follow. For now, the situation underscores the sensitivity and impact of personal allegations involving public officials.