The body of a woman has been found at the base of cliffs near Sandsend, North Yorkshire, marking the fourth fatality in the area within just three days. Authorities have confirmed that there is no suspicion of foul play, though investigations remain ongoing to determine the circumstances surrounding each incident.

According to North Yorkshire Police, the deceased woman was in her 50s and from the local area. She was discovered at approximately 11:01 a.m. by a passerby who immediately contacted emergency services. The recovery operation involved personnel from the police, ambulance, coastguard, lifeboat, and fire services. Her body was retrieved at 12:55 p.m., and the area was reopened to the public just over an hour later. A report is now being prepared for the coroner. Police have appealed for witnesses to come forward and reference incident number 12250143585 for those with any relevant information.

This discovery follows a series of tragic incidents along the North Yorkshire coastline. On July 30, a man and a woman in their 40s died after falling from the cliffs at Whitby. The next day, another woman, believed to be in her 60s, was found deceased near the cliffside pavilion. Despite the close timing and location of the fatalities, authorities have stated that the incidents are not connected and that none are currently being treated as suspicious.

The stretch of coast near Whitby is known for its scenic beauty and attracts both tourists and locals, especially during the summer. However, its rugged terrain and exposed cliffs can present dangers. The recent fatalities have raised concerns among residents and visitors, though officials have stopped short of drawing conclusions about any underlying cause.

North Yorkshire Police are continuing to provide support to the families of those involved and reiterated that public assistance could help in piecing together the events. While these incidents have deeply impacted the community, local law enforcement maintains a presence along the coast to ensure safety and to provide reassurance to the public as investigations proceed.
