Donald Trump, the 45th President of the United States, remains one of the most well-known businessmen-turned-politicians in modern American history. His financial portfolio, built over decades in real estate and entertainment, continues to attract public and media attention, particularly during key moments in U.S. politics.

According to estimates from Forbes, Trump's net worth currently stands at around $2.6 billion. While this figure fluctuates with market trends, property valuations, and business ventures, it reflects the enduring scale of his wealth.

Trump's fortune is largely rooted in real estate, particularly in New York City. The Trump Organisation owns or manages a range of high-profile properties, including office buildings, luxury hotels, golf courses, and residential towers. Signature assets such as Trump Tower in Manhattan and his resort in Mar-a-Lago, Florida, remain central to his brand.

Beyond property, Trump has also profited from licensing deals, using his name on various real estate and product lines globally. Prior to his presidency, he gained significant income through television, especially as host of the reality series The Apprentice, which aired for over a decade.

His financial affairs have often drawn scrutiny. During and after his presidency, questions over tax filings, valuations, and potential conflicts of interest have led to legal and public debate. Trump has maintained that his business success is evidence of his capability as a leader and economic strategist.
