A woman in Delhi has been arrested for allegedly killing her husband after growing frustrated with what she described as his inability to satisfy her sexually. The incident, which initially appeared to be a suicide, has been confirmed as a case of premeditated murder following an investigation by local authorities.

According to police reports, the accused brought her husband, identified as Mohammad Shahid, to the hospital, claiming he had stabbed himself. Medical staff, however, discovered multiple stab wounds on his chest that raised suspicions. A post-mortem examination later confirmed the wounds were not self-inflicted but caused by an attack from the front, ruling out suicide.

Investigators then examined the woman's phone, uncovering a series of search queries that included phrases like "how to kill" and "how to delete chat history." The woman had also looked into poisonous substances and attempted to cover her tracks digitally. Faced with the mounting evidence, she confessed to stabbing her husband three times in the chest during a confrontation at their home.

The accused told police that her dissatisfaction with their physical relationship had led to frustration, which eventually drove her to commit the crime. She then transported his body to the hospital in an attempt to make it appear as suicide.

The weapon used in the killing has been recovered, and the woman remains in police custody. Authorities are continuing their investigation to determine whether she acted alone or received any help in planning the murder.
