India has officially welcomed the recent peace treaty signed between Armenia and Azerbaijan in Washington, D.C., signaling a meaningful step toward greater stability in the South Caucasus region. The agreement, brokered with involvement from key international actors including the United States, aims to resolve long-standing hostilities and foster constructive cooperation between the two nations.

The treaty addresses critical issues such as ceasefire enforcement, precise border demarcation, and the reopening of previously disrupted economic and transport links. After decades of conflict marked by intermittent clashes, the peace deal offers renewed optimism for a stable and secure environment in a region that plays a strategic role in global energy supplies and trade routes.

India's positive response to the agreement reflects its broader geopolitical interests in promoting stability across crucial areas of Eurasia. As a growing global power with expanding economic and energy ties, India has a vested interest in the peaceful resolution of conflicts that could impact global markets and regional security.

Along with endorsing the Armenia–Azerbaijan peace treaty, India expressed support for the recent summit between the United States and Russia. The summit, conducted amid rising international tensions and geopolitical challenges, addressed a range of pressing topics, including nuclear arms control, counterterrorism, and regional conflicts.

In a recent interview with The Economic Times, Rajiv Malhotra, a respected Indian foreign affairs analyst, commented on India's diplomatic approach: "India's endorsement of the US–Russia summit highlights its pragmatic and balanced foreign policy. Engaging constructively with both superpowers allows India to safeguard its national interests and encourages dialogue in an increasingly polarized global landscape."

The Armenian–Azerbaijani peace agreement is seen by many observers as a crucial milestone in a region that has long suffered from instability. It includes specific mechanisms to enforce ceasefires, define borders more clearly, and revive trade and transport connections that are vital for economic growth.

India's backing of this treaty, alongside its support for diplomatic engagement between Washington and Moscow, is consistent with a foreign policy focused on practical outcomes rather than ideological disputes. The country continues to emphasize the importance of regional stability and economic development, especially as global tensions rise.

The South Caucasus region, rich in energy resources and situated at a geopolitical crossroads, remains a focus of international attention. Stability there not only benefits the immediate countries but also supports broader international energy security and trade.

India's stance emerges at a time when the international community faces growing challenges, including the resurgence of authoritarian regimes and ongoing conflicts that threaten the rules-based global order. By encouraging peaceful negotiation and supporting direct talks among major powers, India reinforces its role as a responsible global actor, promoting stability and cooperation.

This approach aligns with India's long-standing foreign policy principle of non-interference combined with active diplomacy, prioritizing constructive engagement and dialogue over confrontation.
