An urgent police investigation is underway after a female tourist was allegedly raped in a public park on Sydney's Northern Beaches, sparking public concern and a call for witnesses.

Authorities in Sydney have launched an urgent investigation after a woman visiting Australia reported being raped in a public park on the city's Northern Beaches. The incident, which allegedly took place in a well-known recreational area, has raised serious concerns about public safety and prompted a call for witnesses.

According to the New South Wales Police Force, the woman was allegedly attacked by a man while she was in the park alone. The alleged assault is believed to have occurred recently, though specific details such as the time and exact location have not yet been made public due to the sensitive nature of the case and the ongoing investigation.

Detectives from the State Crime Command's Sex Crimes Squad are working closely with local officers to gather evidence and identify the suspect. Police have described the investigation as high-priority, and they are urging anyone who may have seen anything suspicious in the area to come forward.

"This is a deeply disturbing report, and we are treating it with the utmost seriousness," a spokesperson for the New South Wales Police Force said. "We are supporting the victim and following all leads to ensure that the person responsible is brought to justice."

Forensic specialists have examined the scene, and investigators are reviewing CCTV footage from nearby locations in hopes of identifying the suspect or any witnesses. Authorities have not yet released a description of the man believed to be involved, but they are appealing to members of the public who may have been in the area at the time to share any information, no matter how minor it may seem.

The alleged incident has sparked renewed discussions about the safety of public spaces, particularly for women walking or exercising alone. Local residents expressed concern over the attack and emphasized the need for more visible security measures in parks and public areas.

Support services are also reminding the public that help is available for anyone affected by sexual violence. Victims are encouraged to seek assistance from organizations such as 1800RESPECT, Australia's national support service for sexual assault, domestic and family violence.

As the investigation continues, police are expected to increase patrols in the area and maintain a strong presence in community spaces. Authorities have assured the public that every effort is being made to find the person responsible and prevent similar incidents from occurring in the future.
