Seven police officers were abducted in Pakistan's Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province, highlighting growing security concerns in the region.

In a deeply alarming incident, seven police officers were abducted in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KP), a province in northwestern Pakistan known for its rugged terrain and proximity to tribal regions. The abductions took place in a volatile area where security forces have frequently clashed with militants in recent years.

According to reports, the officers were on duty when they were seized by unidentified armed individuals. The exact location and timing of the abduction have not yet been officially confirmed, but local authorities believe the incident is part of a broader pattern of rising attacks on law enforcement personnel in the province.

Security forces have launched a large-scale search operation to recover the abducted officers. Local police and paramilitary units are working in coordination to track the perpetrators and secure the release of their colleagues. So far, no group has claimed responsibility for the abduction, but suspicion has fallen on armed militants active in the region.
