Wing Commander Robyne Green has been awarded the prestigious Federation Star in recognition of her extraordinary 52 years of service to the Royal Australian Air Force (RAAF). This article highlights Green's remarkable career, the significance of the award, and the broader context of Australia's defence commitments.

On July 23, 2025, Wing Commander Green received the Federation Star at a ceremony acknowledging her exceptional long-term dedication to the Australian Defence Force (ADF). The Federation Star is one of the highest non-combat honours, awarded to personnel who have rendered at least 40 years of service. Green's career reflects outstanding commitment, leadership, and resilience throughout decades of military operations and training.

Her service includes key roles in operational support and mentoring within the RAAF, contributing to Australia's defence readiness and capability. The award ceremony underscored the importance of recognising individuals whose sustained efforts strengthen national security.

The Federation Star presentation also comes amid ongoing discussions about Australia's defence strategy and investment. As regional tensions in the Indo-Pacific rise, maintaining a highly skilled and experienced military force remains critical. Defence officials have praised veterans like Green for embodying the values and dedication essential to the ADF's mission.

While the Albanese government continues to balance diplomatic and defence priorities, the celebration of Wing Commander Green's service highlights the enduring human element behind Australia's security framework.
