A man has been found dead inside a Wellington home in New South Wales, prompting police to launch a suspicious death investigation.

Just after 10:15pm on Friday, 25 July 2025, officers from the Orana Mid-Western Police District responded to a concern-for-welfare call at a residence on Walker Crescent in Wellington, located in the state's central west.

Upon arrival, police entered the home and discovered the body of a man inside the premises. He is believed to be in his 60s and a resident of the property, though formal identification is still pending.

Authorities have declared the circumstances surrounding the death suspicious. A crime scene was quickly established, and an investigation into the cause of death is underway. Forensic specialists have been called in to examine the area, and officers are working to piece together the events leading up to the discovery.

Police have not released any further details regarding the man's identity, potential injuries, or whether any persons of interest have been identified. No arrests have been made at this stage.

Local residents in the area have expressed concern about the heavy police presence overnight, with some reporting roadblocks and officers conducting inquiries nearby.

The Orana Mid-Western Police District is urging anyone with information that may assist the investigation to come forward. Community members can contact Crime Stoppers on 1800 333 000 or submit information anonymously online.

At this time, police say inquiries remain ongoing, and updates will be provided as more information becomes available.

Wellington, a rural town located roughly 360 kilometres northwest of Sydney, has a small population and is typically known for its quiet community atmosphere. Incidents of this nature are rare in the area, adding to public interest in the case.

Authorities have reassured the community that there is no ongoing threat to public safety, but are encouraging vigilance and cooperation with the ongoing investigation.
